A Manual of Electricity, Practical and Theoretical Dec 22 2019 This historic book may have numerous typos and missing text. Purchasers can usually download a free scanned copy of the original book (without typos) from the publisher. Not indexed. Not illustrated. 1857 edition. Excerpt: ...between a copper wire and a brass ring. The intensity of the heat, when charcoal points were used, burned the charcoal rapidly away, and a file was deflagrated by the flame, even when the circuit was partially interrupted Dr. Callan estimates the power of a cast iron battery of his construction to be about fifteen times greater than that of a Wollaston's battery of the same size, and to be one-half more powerful than a Grove's nitric acid battery. Dr. Callan has since proposed to improve the action of his battery by making the cylinders of sheet tin, coated with an alloy composed of tin and iron in nearly equal proportions. Upon tin plates the diluted sulphuric acid has scarcely any action. The battery contrived by Mr. Grove must be regarded more as a theoretical curiosity than as a practical means of producing electricity. In this battery the only metal used was platinum, thin strips of which are inserted in tubes partially filled alternately with different acidulated liquid. In the original arrangement Hydrogen gases were used alternately, and diluted sulphuric acid. With a series of tubes, about a quarter of an inch wide, one tube, a shock was given that could be felt with the hands, a brilliant spark was given, water was decomposed, and various experiments were made. The gases, which were found to produce water in the tubes were charged with a very strong current, nor was there any excited when carbonic acid and nitrogen, or oxygen and nitrogen, were employed; but with hydrogen and chlorine, or chlorine and carbonic oxide, the effects were very good. Mr. Grove found that...
